One-third of foster kids in Quebec who reunited with their biological families after being in the care of protected services had a reoccurrence of neglect, abuse or underwent child behavioral problems within five years, a new study shows.

According to a study looking into Quebec's 16 youth-protection centers, researchers discovered that 33 per cent of the 4,120 children - aged 17 or younger - who had been in child protective services in 2008 or 2009, reentered the system within five years after being returned to their biological families.

Special Immigrant Juvenile Status: Recent Changes You Should Know About

On September 27, 2014, Governor Brown signed Senate Bill 873 (Stats. 2014, ch. 685), which took effect immediately. Several of the bill's provisions respond to the influx of unaccompanied, undocumented children into the United States from Central America. Federal immigration law provides a number of mechanisms for these children to pursue legal residence in the United States. Most of these proceed entirely at the federal level; however, Special Immigrant Juvenile (SIJ) classification, a temporary benefit for maltreated children, requires state court findings as a predicate to eligibility.
